Susan Pesti–Strobel hails from Hungary and is a lecturer at the USU Department of English teaching writing and literature courses, including an introductory course to Shakespeare and an upper level lit course on Gothic Literature. She uses her own background to teach her students about irony. When she is not chasing after comma splices and run-on sentences in her students' writing, she writes and reviews poetry. Her poems have been published in the wordriver anthology and in the chapbooks of her Logan poetry group, Poetry@3. She has been presenting papers on vampire lore in films and folklore, on the supernatural in turn-of-the-century Hungarian literature, and autobiographical elements in fiction. She spends her free time on writing a longer autobiographical essay that may or may not turn into a memoir.
