Tara Penry is Professor of English at Boise State University, where she has taught American literature since 2000. She specializes in nineteenth-century literature and the literature of the American West. She has published articles on writers including Herman Melville, Terry Tempest Williams, and western short story author Bret Harte. A recipient of an Idaho Humanities Council fellowship in 2015 to research and write a book about Bret Harte's fiction, she is a past president of the Western Literature Association and former editor of the Western Writers Series at Boise State. She lives in Boise with her husband and two children.
