

Let's Talk About It – Program Scholar

---

Rachel Clark

Rachel Clark is an independent writer and biologist. As a freelancer since the mid-1990s, she began reporting on climate change right around the time Bill McKibben published his seminal The End of Nature. It was an uphill climb! She's also covered many other related issues. Along the way she confronted the dominance paradigm at the heart of these harms, including the powerful, well-funded climate denial machine. Her research took her to a far more ancient human narrative: partnership and regenerative culture. She founded her blog, Mothering Nature, at Psychology Today, to spotlight these healing stories and ideas. Her first novel The Blackfish Prophecy has as its core theme: the interconnection of life and how humans can support epic harmony. Along with voices in the Blackfish community, the book is endorsed by Bill McKibben, Riane Eisler, and Jane Goodall. Rachel is currently working in creative non-fiction and developing the sequels that follow The Blackfish Prophecy. Her work has appeared in Nature News Online, Psychology Today, The Revelator, Harper's Bazaar, The Joint Fire Science Program, Salon, Mental Floss, Farmer's Almanac, Earth & Sky Radio, Mom.me, The Dodo & more. You can connect with Rachel's work at: rachelclarkauthor.com.